Read the letter to the editor below and then answer questions 1-7.

Dear Editor,

I am the director of the Detroit Zoo. Next month I am leaving my job after thirty years of work. Before I retire I would like people to know about the unsuitable conditions for wild animals in zoos.

5 For many years as the zoo director, I have tried to improve the conditions of wild animals. However, I feel I have not done enough. Many of the wild animals in zoos are unhappy and unhealthy. Elephants, for example, suffer more than any other wild animal. In nature, elephants get lots of exercise. They walk about sixty kilometers a day. They also eat a large variety of trees and bushes and live with other elephants in 10 large groups. None of these conditions exist in our zoos today.

Recently I participated in a meeting of zoo directors from around the country. We discussed my ideas about the ways to make zoos better places. We agreed that a few things should be done. First of all, zoos should only keep animals which are used to the climate of the area. For example, in our zoo in Detroit, where the winter is very cold, 15 we should not keep lions or tigers because they are used to hot weather. In addition, if we want wild animals to stay healthy, we must feed them the same food they would eat in nature. Zoos should also give animals a large enough living area so they can get the exercise they need.

I hope you will publish my letter because I think your readers should realize that many 20 wild animals suffer in zoos and something must be done about it.

Dr. David Handler
